

AUSTRALIAN INSTITUTE
of LANGUAGE

Do you think that the English Language will continue to remain as the global language despite globalization? Support your point of view with details from your own experiences, observations or reading.

There are many spoken languages around the world, but the English Language is considered in the international language. In my opinion, although globalization is bound to occur, English Language will still remain as the global language. This is because the English Language has already been the international language for centuries and also because almost every country already lists their international products in English.

Ever since ancient times, English Language has been declared the international language and has always been a language of conversation between different countries. For example, when different countries around the world gather for events such as the Olympics, English will be the main communication language. Therefore, it is a difficult and tedious process to alter this tradition that has already been ongoing for centuries to another language as the global language.

Furthermore, majority of the countries around the world has already made it a habit to translate their products to English when marketing globally. If the global language was to be changed, these countries will then have to go through tedious processes to change the language on every product, which I believe will not be the preferred situation

In conclusion, although some countries are developing in the economic industry, the English Language will still remain as the international language.

The chances of another language being the international language are not impossible, but will take a long time.

(230 words)

我们的联系方式：

地址： Level 2, 388 Bourke St, Melbourne, VIC 3000.

联系电话： (03) 9670 8868; 0425 465 522

Email: pte@ail.vic.edu.au

Australia
(03) 9670 8868

language
465522